This way I don't have to override the "action" of the controller or anything like that. I was thinking it could just be this: public static int GetUrlHandler(string url, HttpContext context) { //we don't need any "context" things (is it right???) var routeData = new RouteData(); routeData.Values.Add("controller", "News"); routeData.Values.Add("action", url); //... return 0; } What do you think? This would just work with: [HttpGet] public ActionResult GetNews(int newsId) { return View("News", newsId); } A: The problem with your code is that URL parameters are always optional. If your NewsController wants to return some arbitrary content for "news" the first argument to the GetNews function would be null, and you'd get an ArgumentException in routeData.Values.Add("action", url);. If I were you, I would write a separate abstract base class like this: public abstract class NewsControllerBase : Controller { public static int GetUrlHandler(string url, HttpContext context) { //the controller is News 1cb139a0ed
